The Dangers of Euthanasia and Physician-Assisted Suicide

Dear Committee Chair,

This submission is made by the Canberra Declaration, which has been signed by 76,414 Australian citizens of which 10,455 are from Western Australia. We oppose the legalisation of euthanasia and physician-assisted suicide in Australian society.

Under the heading 'Human Life' the Canberra Declaration states – "We believe that all human life, being made in the image of God, has intrinsic and equal value from conception to life's natural end. ...The very heart of a humane and civilised society is based on the way it treats its most vulnerable and innocent members including the unborn and the disabled. ... We will not comply with any directive that compels us to participate in or facilitate abortion, embryo-destructive research, assisted suicide, euthanasia, or any other act that involves the intentional taking of innocent human life" (underscores added).

While Australians are a compassionate people, our compassion should never drive us to support killing an individual through euthanasia or to help someone with their suicide. Collectively as Australians we have a duty of care for the vulnerable members of our society. Sadly, the euphemistic descriptions of euthanasia and assisted suicide such as 'assisted dying' or 'death with dignity' are very misleading. While the deaths of vulnerable citizens are the result, these practices are in the final analysis not about dying but about killing. In a similar vein, the legalisation of euthanasia and assisted suicide does not give individuals the 'right to die' but the 'right to be killed' by a physician or by their own hand.

We, therefore, maintain that doctors need to operate with absolute repugnance to killing their patients. Australian Medical Association president Dr Michael Gannon has publicly stated that "doctors should have no role in intentionally ending a patient's life." As a medical professional, he is not alone in saying this. Dr Gannon points out that 107 medical associations out of 109 world-wide oppose euthanasia.

Euthanasia and physician-assisted suicide completely overturn present longstanding medical ethics. This drastically changes the relationship between doctors and their patients. Every doctor potentially becomes an agent of state-sanctioned killing. This duty to kill goes against the Hippocratic Oath which states "I will neither give a deadly drug to anybody if asked for it, nor will I make a suggestion to this effect." In forswearing not giving of poison when a patient asks for it, the physician rejects the view that the patient's choice to be killed can make killing him or her right.

In considering end of life choices, Australia has the advantage of observing what has happened in countries where euthanasia and assisted suicide have been legalised. One very sobering observation is that, wherever these practices have been legalised, they have always expanded to include more groups of vulnerable people. This unintended and apparently unavoidable outcome is now described as “scope creep”. This is where the criteria for state-sanctioned killing grows to include people with non-terminal illnesses, psychological disorders, and even the euthanasia of children.

In 2014, Belgium became the first country to allow the euthanasia of children. In the Netherlands, there has been a very dramatic increase of euthanasia for chronic psychiatric patients and patients with advanced dementia. Tragically, there are a growing number of horrific reports of hospital patients being euthanised without consent or without the notification of family members. The October 14-15 Australian reported that Dutch surveys disclose that physicians “have with virtual impunity, failed to report thousands of cases and have given lethal injections to thousands of patients without request.”

Canada, however, has become the prime example of how these practices cannot be controlled by law. Several weeks ago Health Canada reported that there were nearly 2,000 deaths by euthanasia in the first year of its legalisation. It seems that the number deaths by euthanasia each year in Canada will quickly surpass the Netherlands and Belgium where it has been legal since 2002 and 2003 respectively. Already a push to extend the 2016 Canadian law is underway in the courts.

Euthanasia and assisted suicide are huge social changes which are fraught with dangers than can lead to horrific abuses. We urge Western Australia to heed the wise counsel of Australian, international and historic experts in medical ethics. Australian society needs policies that encourage caring for and saving of lives - not killing.

As the Canberra Declaration states “the very heart of a humane and civilised society is based on the way it treats its most vulnerable and innocent members ...”

Please vigorously recommend against the legalisation of euthanasia and physician-assisted suicide in Western Australia.

Yours faithfully,

for the Canberra Declaration Team & Community
