

Three Branches of Government

The system of government in Western Australia is that of a parliamentary democracy based on the rule of law. More than 250 years ago, a famous French philosopher, the Baron de Montesquieu, published a book The Spirit of the Laws (1748). In the book he claimed that liberty existed in England because of the way in which the system of government was organised. He recognised three branches of government: namely the legislature; executive; and judiciary. Each branch checked each other to prevent any person or arm becoming too powerful. Western Australia's constitution does not exactly follow the ideas set down by Montesquieu as there are, in reality, overlaps. Viewing the three branches of government does assist in understanding how the government is structured.

1. Legislature

The power to make laws. In Western Australia, the legislative arm of government is the Parliament (the 'legislature'). The Western Australian Parliament is bicameral (made up of two houses), consisting of the Legislative Council (upper house) and the Legislative Assembly (lower house).

2. Executive

The power to execute (enforce) laws. The executive has the power to put into effect, in individual cases, the general rules made under the legislative power. In Western Australia, the peak executive body is the Executive Council. The Executive Council is appointed by the Governor under Letters Patent issued by His Majesty the King. In practice it consists of all the members of the ministry and is presided over by the Governor. All ministers also meet as a body called the cabinet, which is led by the Premier. The Premier and the cabinet are not recognised in the constitution, but in practice make the major decisions relating to government policy and guide ministerial decision-making. The carrying out or execution of the laws is undertaken by the public service (government departments) and statutory authorities.

3. Judiciary

The power to interpret and apply laws. In Western Australia, the judicial arm of government is the hierarchy of courts (the 'judiciary'), headed by the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice of Western Australia is the state's chief judicial officer. The High Court of Australia is the nation's highest court.

Although the functions of government in Western Australia can conveniently be classified into legislative, executive, and judicial, there is no formal constitutional separation of these powers as there is, for instance, in the constitution of the United States.
